If you've been with us for some time, you've witnessed our struggle at Standing Rock to stop the Dakota Access pipeline and the Anishinaabe resistance to the Line 3 pipeline. You've been a friend to us, and you've come to know many Indigenous water and land protectors fighting for our sacred lands and waterways. What you may not know is that, for years, our Wet'suwet'en relatives have undertaken a similar struggle in their own territory, to our north in what we now call Canada. They need our attention and support, too.

Militarized enforcement against our Wet'suwet'en relatives by Royal Canadian Mounted Police looks all too familiar to those of us in the anti-pipeline movement.

On Friday, Nov 19, 21, Royal Canadian Mounted Police raided an Indigenous-led blockade with dogs and assault rifles. They arrested two journalists and at least 13 others at the frontlines, the latest in a series of arrests dating back to 2019.

The Wet'suwet'en are doing all they can to stop construction of TransCanada's 670km Coastal GasLink pipeline, because a third of this pipeline would cross their homelands on its way to a facility in coastal Kitimat.

Wet'suwet'en hereditary chiefs have refused to give consent for the project, and, crucially, they have never signed a formal treaty with the provincial government or relinquished their land. Much like our #NoDAPL fight, this is both an environmental and a sovereignty issue; the Wet'suwet'en are also attempting to protect sensitive headwaters.

In September, they put out a call for support, and this newsletter is an amplification of that call. I ask that, for now, you please visit their page to get more up to speed. As we go forward, the Lakota People's Law Project will keep our eyes on things, and — just as so many did for us at Standing Rock — we'll stand with our First Nations relatives in the best way we can.
